in part to Britain, the suggestion that teach-ins do not provoke thought, fruitful discussion or fair debate strikes us as ludicrous. Through our activity the Vietnam War has for the first time been opened to general debate and significant debate in the country at large. The political process requires that all points of view be effectively represented over time that they stand on various occasions and on every occasion.

Nevertheless the sort of clear _argument, suggestion, advanced by Edward Fealman _who claimed that all points of view are always represented, a teach-in is unfair, is widely endured.
